

Photosynthesis Overview

Plants convert sunlight into chemical energy through photosynthesis. The process begins when chlorophyll absorbs photons and uses their energy to split water molecules in the thylakoid membranes.

The Calvin cycle then fixes atmospheric carbon dioxide into glucose. Each turn of the cycle consumes three molecules of carbon dioxide and produces one three-carbon sugar called glyceraldehyde-3-phosphate.